ABOUT THE MAJOR

Nutrition: Community Health

How the body uses nutrients at the cellular level and in the whole body system plus food and nutrient needs throughout the life cycle in both health and disease states.

The UT department of Nutrition offers a Bachelor of Science degree in nutrition with concentration in Community Health. The Community Nutrition concentration focuses on working with individuals and communities to promote wellness and prevent disease. This concentration prepares students for careers as nutrition educations, WIC nutritionists, health and wellness coaches, and wellness program coordinators across a variety of settings.

Nutrition: Community Health majors must maintain a 3.0 cumulative GPA and complete all NUTR classes with a C or better.
